

ABSTRACT

A card reader is equipped with an encryption module that encrypts account information derived from a customer's card. The encrypted account information may be sent over unprotected wires to a site controller and a security
5 module. In this manner, the account information is protected from fraudulent interception while minimizing the cost of system installation. The card reader may be a magnetic card reader or a smart card reader.